New Finger Paint Pillows from Kevin O'Brien Studio

Philadelphia, PA -- Kevin O'Brien Studio's new Finger Paint pillow collection is as appealing to their adult fans as it is to their kids. The company's original artwork is usually created by O'Brien himself, but this new collection was designed by a toddler.

One day O'Brien's son Valentine was spreading paint around a large sheet of paper, and when his father looked upon it, he realized that he was looking at his next great textile design. "I came back five minutes later to collect it, only to find that he had rubbed a generous amount of purple all over his once fine abstract painting," recalls O'Brien. As O'Brien monitored the creation of the next painting, ready to snatch it away when it had just the right combination of color and free expression, he realized that he could not hover around, ready to interfere with a child's freedom (even for a great pillow). Valentine went on to produce quite a body of work over the next few days, and there were almost too many perfectly beautiful compositions to choose from.

Two pillows from the collection

O'Brien soon passed the paintings on to his team in Philadelphia, and the artwork was then transformed into a collection of textiles. There are six different Finger Paint pillows which will make their market debut in August at NYIGF. Each of the six pillows is unique in pattern and color, digitally printed onto a crisp white cotton twill, and finished off with a colorful piping along the edges. This collection falls in line with the current market trend of brush stroke motifs and saturated colors. The company is currently working on developing a series of Finger Paint curtains, and area rug designs as well.
